Why it Matters

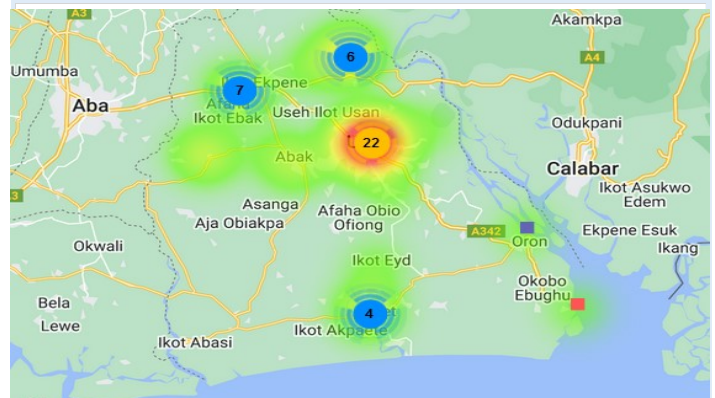

The prevalence of domestic violence and homicide has the potential to increase communal and interpersonal violence in the State. If not mitigated, the situation could intensify in ways that could adversely impact the dynamics of conflict and insecurity. This could result in mob lynching, reprisal violence, protests and a breakdown of law and order, which could bring about socio-economic disruptions and political instability, with far-reaching security consequences in the State.

Social: The prevalence of domestic violence and homicide could bring about serious psychosocial and health consequences that could undermine communal stability and the social wellbeing of residents. Domestic homicide could destabilize families and cause social dysfunction. Increased cases of domestic homicide could cause a general feeling of insecurity that can cause public unrest and mob violence. This could intensify communal tensions and insecurity in the State.

Economic: The rising prevalence of domestic violence and homicide could impose enormous economic cost on families, communities and the government, including the costs of funeral for victims, healthcare services for survivors, psychosocial support for families, and legal expenses. Financial burdens imposed by domestic violence and homicide could destabilize families and reduce the productivity of households. This could undermine the economic wellbeing of residents.

Political: The prevalence of domestic violence and homicide could cause serious challenges for law enforcement and governance. It could trigger outrage, protests and unrest that can cause a breakdown of law and disruption of governance and public service delivery.
